Interview with Dr. Jochen Biedermann, Managing Director of World Alliance of International Financial Centers

The WAIFC Board of Directors will meet in Kigali from March 22 to 24, by invitation of Rwanda Finance. Which role do African financial centers play at WAIFC and in the global financial industry?

In recent decades, we have witnessed a substantial expansion of international financial centers, with many new launches, particularly in Asia. This trend demonstrates enormous commitment to serve the needs of these economies.

Recently, we have witnessed several African financial centers following the same growth path and gaining global prominence, particularly for new business emphases like sustainable finance or FinTech. We are delighted that with Casablanca, Kigali, and Mauritius, three of the most promising African financial centers are already WAIFC members. We are in discussion with additional ones to join our association soon. That said, we have strict selection criteria for new members in terms of regional diversity, economic substance, fit and proper standards for business conduct and regulation, because we want accession to membership of WAIFC to be based on trust for solid and lasting collaboration in our alliance.

We expect strong growth in Africa in this and in coming decades, which will lead to much higher sustained demand for financial services, mainly from the middle class and a prosperous corporate sector. This growth will attract many international financial service providers to African financial centers, particularly those that offer a sound legal and regulatory environment and a stable political system. Within the WAIFC network, our African members can learn from the best practices of other financial centers and build up their global visibility.

I am sure that in the next decade, we can learn from African financial centers how to use modern technology to solve critical issues like financing the transition towards net-zero and enabling more members of society to be included in the offer of publicly regulated financial services.

The WAIFC has recently announced its inaugural Young Academic Award, which many universities globally have welcomed. What do you expect from this initiative?

All our members do their best to develop their financial centers at a time when the global financial system itself is undergoing rapid evolution. We all agree that the financial centers of the future will be green, innovative, intelligent, customer-centric, and inclusive.

New technologies like artificial intelligence and blockchain lead to automation, digitalization, and decentralization. Additionally, there is a greater focus on providing more financing to SMEs and including more members of society in the formal financial services offer. Furthermore, we see a long-term transition toward a sustainable financial industry, while in the near-term, there is a need to support economic recovery from the pandemic.
Universities will educate new talent to master those changes, while financial centers have to re-train parts of the existing workforce at the same time.

We are convinced that the best ideas to manage the transition of financial centers will not come from our members alone. We need to seek new insights and fresh perspectives from the next generation of researchers and thought leaders. Therefore, we have launched the WAIFC annual research award competition. We are very much looking forward to the dialogue with young academics in general, and the winners of the WAIFC Young Academic Award in particular, when we invite them to our Annual General Meeting in Casablanca in October.

Opinion of Thomas Krantz on the Shock of War and Financial Stability

The author analyses the structures and basic functions of the financial system, with a special focus on the work of central banks.

"In March 2022, the world is shocked by war. While the conduct and outcome of the conflict are unknown as to scope, time, and consequences, in just days, the macroeconomic impacts across the globe are already considerable."
